DID YOU KNOW?
Ancient Chamorro Cave Art - Gado's Cave
One of the best examples of Chamorro cave art can be found in Inianan at what is known as Gado's Cave. This limestone cave is located above the shoreline, approximately four meters inland. Previous archeological work had been done in the mid-1960s by Fred Reimer, and Gado's Cave was included on the United States National Register of Historic Places in 1973. Measuring these meters wide, two meters high and six meters deep, a group of about 50 pictographs are located on the west wall. The drawings range in size from two to three centimeters in height to twenty centimeters. The designs vary from geometric shapes to representational figures depicting humans or animal-like forms. The pictographs likely were made using white lime that bonded to the wall with a chemical reaction. The lines of each drawing appear uniform in thickness, which implies they were made with the same kind of implement, or perhaps a finger.

GUAMEDIA: FRANCISCO B. LEON GUERRERO

Francisco B. Leon Guerrero, also known as “Mr. Organic Act” was known for his groundbreaking role in advancing the cause of American citizenship for the people of Guam. Leon Guerrero was an ardent opponent of what he deemed “naturalization.” He fought for a civil government that did not adhere to military restrictions. Leon Guerrero entered federal politics in the wake of Franklin Roosevelt’s election and the subsequent New Deal policies in 1932. After World War II, Leon Guerrero continued his politics of self-autonomy for the people of Guam by forming the Friends of Guam and the Welfare Party. He was unequivocally the leader on the arduous campaign for the granting of US citizenship to the people of Guam. Success finally came in 21 May 1949, when the Guam Congress funded a two-man committee of Leon Guerrero and Antonio Won Pat to once again lobby for citizenship. President Truman ordered the Interior Department to draft the Organic Act, made Guam an unincorporated, organized territory. Island residents gained civil government and American citizenship.
