A HÄFA ADAI PLEDGE CEREMONY WAS HELD FEBRUARY 26 AT THE CRACKED EGG in Tumon. From Left: Tetsu Taguma, Grilla, deputy general manager; Nancy Marie Barrientez, head of CNTC Corporation, president; Annette T. Mesa, The Cracked Egg, owner; Lory Tydingco, The Cracked Egg, owner; Antonio Blas, The Cracked Egg, owner; Fionna Wesley, Lorraine Blas, general manager; Marie Benavente, Zero Gravity LLC, dba: Guffing, general manager and Sandra Silverio Chan, Zero Gravity LLC, dba: Guffing, co-owner proudly display their newly signed Håfa Adai Pledge.

GUAMEDIA: Photography

Photography as an art form is relatively new on Guam. There have been visiting photographers on Guam since the early 1900s. However, the evolution of photography as a form of artistic expression for island residents has happened within the past decade.

GUAM’S NOTABLE PHOTOGRAPHERS

Joseph Delgado, considered to be the father of Guam photography, is a retired portrait and commercial photographer. He was the first known formally-trained photographer on Guam. Delgado came to Guam as the chief photographer for Guam Cable TV News.

Manny Crisostomo, also an award winning photojournalist, has an art gallery and operates the Fish Eye Marine Park. The 10,000 fish tank is the largest in the region where you can stop and watch the fish and other marine life.

Norman Taruc, called “Rarotongan,” Pukapukan and Cook Island Maori, also called “Rarotongan,” Pukapukan and Cook Island Maori, also an experienced photographer such as Steve Hardy, is one of Guam’s most experienced photographers. For his art photography, he prefers using a Nikon camera, although he always uses a Pentax to do his news events. Guam’s tourism industry provided opportunities for local photographers on Guam since the early 1900s. However, the evolution of photography as a form of artistic expression for island residents has happened within the past decade.

DELGADO, including Phil Noble, and Julian Ereno, a portrait and commercial photographer. He was the first known formally-trained photographer on Guam. Delgado came to Guam as the chief photographer for Guam Cable TV News.

Manny Crisostomo, also an award winning photojournalist, has an art gallery and operates the Fish Eye Marine Park. The 10,000 fish tank is the largest in the region where you can stop and watch the fish and other marine life.

Norman Taruc, called “Rarotongan,” Pukapukan and Cook Island Maori, also called “Rarotongan,” Pukapukan and Cook Island Maori, also an experienced photographer such as Steve Hardy, is one of Guam’s most experienced photographers. For his art photography, he prefers using a Nikon camera, although he always uses a Pentax to do his news events. Guam’s tourism industry provided opportunities for local photographers on Guam since the early 1900s. However, the evolution of photography as a form of artistic expression for island residents has happened within the past decade.

GUAM’S NOTABLE PHOTOGRAPHERS

Joseph Delgado, considered to be the father of Guam photography, is a retired portrait and commercial photographer. He was the first known formally-trained photographer on Guam. Delgado came to Guam as the chief photographer for Guam Cable TV News.

Manny Crisostomo, also an award winning photojournalist, has an art gallery and operates the Fish Eye Marine Park. The 10,000 fish tank is the largest in the region where you can stop and watch the fish and other marine life.

Norman Taruc, called “Rarotongan,” Pukapukan and Cook Island Maori, also called “Rarotongan,” Pukapukan and Cook Island Maori, also an experienced photographer such as Steve Hardy, is one of Guam’s most experienced photographers. For his art photography, he prefers using a Nikon camera, although he always uses a Pentax to do his news events. Guam’s tourism industry provided opportunities for local photographers on Guam since the early 1900s. However, the evolution of photography as a form of artistic expression for island residents has happened within the past decade.

GUAM’S NOTABLE PHOTOGRAPHERS

Joseph Delgado, considered to be the father of Guam photography, is a retired portrait and commercial photographer. He was the first known formally-trained photographer on Guam. Delgado came to Guam as the chief photographer for Guam Cable TV News.

Manny Crisostomo, also an award winning photojournalist, has an art gallery and operates the Fish Eye Marine Park. The 10,000 fish tank is the largest in the region where you can stop and watch the fish and other marine life.

Norman Taruc, called “Rarotongan,” Pukapukan and Cook Island Maori, also called “Rarotongan,” Pukapukan and Cook Island Maori, also an experienced photographer such as Steve Hardy, is one of Guam’s most experienced photographers. For his art photography, he prefers using a Nikon camera, although he always uses a Pentax to do his news events. Guam’s tourism industry provided opportunities for local photographers on Guam since the early 1900s. However, the evolution of photography as a form of artistic expression for island residents has happened within the past decade.